

SPARK 170

Distinction: You may fear archetypal love because it leaves civilization behind as a stupid gameworld.

Notes: Human beings are designed to consciously navigate 3 domains of love in everyday life: ordinary, extraordinary, and archetypal. Ordinary love seems like the only option most of the time as a consequence of being uninitiated. If you create ordinary love you would go around looking for someone to love you. “Does he love me?” “Will she love me enough?” “Who will love me?” “Does anybody love me?” In ordinary love, the experience of love is scarce, forcing you to be a victim of never having enough love. You learn to fill the longings in your heart and soul by creating low drama as false ecstasy. Modern culture promotes love-survival because then you buy more stuff.

Extraordinary love, on the other hand, is a side-effect of initiations that take you out of childhood survival strategies and into adult-level responsibilities. It is called extraordinary because in modern culture there aren't many adults around. If you get yourself onto an authentic path of ongoing adulthood initiatory processes then wherever you are you take responsibility for love being there. If you are there, love is there because you source love. Wherever you go love is happening. If it isn't, you can do something immediately to change that.

Archetypal love, the third domain, is the natural consequence of taking radical responsibility for creating all of your life's circumstances. Radical responsibility makes archetypal love possible. Archetypal love is the most abundant thing in the universe, and it is impersonal. You have probably experienced archetypal love when you were touched by the beauty of a sunset, through certain music, in ecstasy during meditation, being awed by the complex beauty of a flower or the sweet taste of a mango, or entering the present moment in a small now and being amazed that life even exists and has the possibility of becoming conscious of itself. A person across from you can be a gateway to the archetypal feminine or archetypal masculine. When you gaze into the energetic eyes of another adult human being who is gazing into your energetic eyes with their energetic eyes, and each of you navigates to undefendedness, the Bright Principle of archetypal love can become conscious of itself in a 4-body experience called countenance. It may sound farfetched, but countenance creates yellow-stuff, an energetic substance that helps the evolution of consciousness occur more widely and with greater easefulness.

Just because you are not able to navigate extraordinary and archetypal love does not mean you do not have the pain of missing it. Perhaps you suppress the feelings of missing archetypal experiences through overwork, stressing out, tensions, or other low dramas, but that does not block your heart from feeling the lack.

Having a taste of archetypal love can trigger a longing in you for archetypal love becoming conscious of itself through you.

The longing to experience archetypal love may come from noticing that archetypal love is endless, and you are not. This means you may long for archetypal love even while you are experiencing archetypal love because after you are dead you won't be able to experience it anymore. Any amount of time experiencing archetypal love on Earth is already too short. The invitation here is to learn to enjoy that unbearable lightness of being in archetypal love even if it only lasts 3 seconds. Try to allow the longing in your chest to get bigger while you keep breathing, as if the longing itself is what you longed for, knowing that archetypal love can never be ultimately achieved or accomplished.

Experiment: As Ishmael author Daniel Quinn writes, “Something better than civilization is waiting for us.” The experiment in this S.P.A.R.K. is about trying to discover a part of what that something might be even if this means releasing some of your grip on modern culture – or some of modern culture's grip on you...

What if you could keep your center and refrain from unconsciously adapting to any system or person? What if you used your grounding cord to keep your bubble of personal space free of voices, beliefs, assumptions, and debilitating energies from other people and institutions? What if you distinguished feelings from emotions and used your feelings of anger for setting boundaries and going ahead, fear for being careful and precise, sadness for being vulnerable and appreciative, joy for being kind and generous, and each of your angry, scared, sad, and glad emotions as gateways to healing processes? What if you used your Gremlin to detect and avoid low dramas before they even started, and then used the energy you conserve for creating high dramas that bring the services of your archetypal lineage into action?

The answer to all these “What if?” questions is that you would be growing up. You would enter adult responsibility levels. Adulthood is the entryway to archetypal experiences which human beings are designed for but rarely, until now, could enjoy.

Even though archetypal love is impersonal, it requires at least two people for it to become conscious of itself. The problem is that each person is unique. If you think of a person as a transducer (a device for changing energy of one form into energy of another form like a solar cell changes sunlight into electricity), somehow there needs to be resonance with the partner you choose (the frequency of light needs to match the crystal structure of the solar cell) so that the slightly tainted characteristics of the archetypal love becoming conscious can playfully interact.

The experiment is to find someone your own age (minimum 18 years) or older (not a child) with whom you are resonant enough to practice the 13 requirements for accessing archetypal love. To proceed, read out loud together, slowly, pages 393 through 419 in the book Radiant Joy Brilliant Love. This alone may take you a significant amount of time. Then do all the practices together. I advise you not to stop reading or practicing because you do not understand or cannot already do the practices. Of course you can't. This is the opportunity to learn new stuff together.

Along the way you may come to value the archetypal love experiences more than the so-called security and comfort that modern culture holds out as a carrot to entice you to sacrifice yourself and follow its economic agenda. What if the 2 weeks paid vacation don't matter to you anymore because your life is centered around doing what you most want to do already? What if retirement benefits don't matter because you would never dream of retiring from doing what you came here to do? What if the big house and 2 cars don't matter anymore because the spaces that most interest you are energetic and not physical and are available wherever you create them?

If such inner-value changes happen for you, I encourage you to place them in the center of the new culture you are building. If others do not understand the shifts in your life, keep asking them to help you understand why they so desperately want to live in modern culture's gameworld. If others are attracted to your life-shifts and want that for themselves, send them this S.P.A.R.K.

If your Box is identified with modern civilization but your experiences in archetypal love inspire you to leave bits of modern civilization behind, you may fear that part of yourself would be left behind too. The experiment here is to make plenty of time to enjoy what you newly value, and to hold regular funerals for the parts of your Box that were originally designed to make it possible for you to survive in modern culture but are no longer needed. For each part of your Box that dissolves away find some object in your clutter collection that you can also dispose of (burn, drop in a river, recycle, donate to a second-hand store, etc.) symbolizing the simplification of your life.

Both the 2005 film Merry Christmas (original French title Joyeux Noël) and the book Silent Night by Stanley Weintraub portray the miraculous 1914 Christmas truce during World War I spontaneously created by French, German, and British soldiers who refused to keep killing each other. What actually happened there? Have you ever felt that warming mood of Christmas take over all 4 of your bodies? I think feeling "peace on Earth, goodwill towards men" is the same as feeling yellow-stuff being generated when archetypal love becomes conscious of itself, or when archetypal love is called into a training space. My intention is to inspire many small groups around the world make enough yellow-stuff that the entire global ethnosphere gets saturated to the point that war won't make sense anymore. Will you help me?

Best wishes,
Clinton
